Meet Lynn Harrison of Redland Middle School in Montgomery County, MD. You know you’re onto something good when your school goes from referring over 1200 students to the principal’s office to under 30 in just one year. “As a staff we were thrilled at the respect that was growing in our building,” says Harrison, coordinator of Redland’s Positive Behavior Intervention Strategies (PBIS) program.

The PBIS process emphasizes constructive interventions as an alternative to punitive discipline. Redland, a bright, airy middle school, has struggled with more aggressive, less responsive disciplinary referrals for students and parents.

Despite the systemic obstacles that have hampered progress nationwide, many educators and their schools are finding that caring, more aggressive, less responsive discipline referrals for students and parents.

Meet Lynn Harrison of Redland Middle School in Montgomery County, MD. You know you’re onto something good when your school goes from referring over 1200 students to the principal’s office to under 30 in just one year. “As a staff we were thrilled at the respect that was growing in our building,” says Harrison, coordinator of Redland’s Positive Behavior Intervention Strategies (PBIS) program.

The PBIS process emphasizes constructive interventions as an alternative to punitive discipline. Redland, a bright, airy middle school, has struggled with more aggressive, less responsive disciplinary referrals for students and parents.

Despite the systemic obstacles that have hampered progress nationwide, many educators and their schools are finding that caring, more aggressive, less responsive discipline referrals for students and parents.

Meet Lynn Harrison of Redland Middle School in Montgomery County, MD. You know you’re onto something good when your school goes from referring over 1200 students to the principal’s office to under 30 in just one year. “As a staff we were thrilled at the respect that was growing in our building,” says Harrison, coordinator of Redland’s Positive Behavior Intervention Strategies (PBIS) program.

The PBIS process emphasizes constructive interventions as an alternative to punitive discipline. Redland, a bright, airy middle school, has struggled with more aggressive, less responsive disciplinary referrals for students and parents.

Despite the systemic obstacles that have hampered progress nationwide, many educators and their schools are finding that caring, more aggressive, less responsive discipline referrals for students and parents.

Meet Lynn Harrison of Redland Middle School in Montgomery County, MD. You know you’re onto something good when your school goes from referring over 1200 students to the principal’s office to under 30 in just one year. “As a staff we were thrilled at the respect that was growing in our building,” says Harrison, coordinator of Redland’s Positive Behavior Intervention Strategies (PBIS) program.

The PBIS process emphasizes constructive interventions as an alternative to punitive discipline. Redland, a bright, airy middle school, has struggled with more aggressive, less responsive disciplinary referrals for students and parents.

Despite the systemic obstacles that have hampered progress nationwide, many educators and their schools are finding that caring, more aggressive, less responsive discipline referrals for students and parents.

Meet Lynn Harrison of Redland Middle School in Montgomery County, MD. You know you’re onto something good when your school goes from referring over 1200 students to the principal’s office to under 30 in just one year. “As a staff we were thrilled at the respect that was growing in our building,” says Harrison, coordinator of Redland’s Positive Behavior Intervention Strategies (PBIS) program.

The PBIS process emphasizes constructive interventions as an alternative to punitive discipline. Redland, a bright, airy middle school, has struggled with more aggressive, less responsive disciplinary referrals for students and parents.

Despite the systemic obstacles that have hampered progress nationwide, many educators and their schools are finding that caring, more aggressive, less responsive discipline referrals for students and parents.

Meet Lynn Harrison of Redland Middle School in Montgomery County, MD. You know you’re onto something good when your school goes from referring over 1200 students to the principal’s office to under 30 in just one year. “As a staff we were thrilled at the respect that was growing in our building,” says Harrison, coordinator of Redland’s Positive Behavior Intervention Strategies (PBIS) program.

The PBIS process emphasizes constructive interventions as an alternative to punitive discipline. Redland, a bright, airy middle school, has struggled with more aggressive, less responsive disciplinary referrals for students and parents.

Despite the systemic obstacles that have hampered progress nationwide, many educators and their schools are finding that caring, more aggressive, less responsive discipline referrals for students and parents.

Meet Lynn Harrison of Redland Middle School in Montgomery County, MD. You know you’re onto something good when your school goes from referring over 1200 students to the principal’s office to under 30 in just one year. “As a staff we were thrilled at the respect that was growing in our building,” says Harrison, coordinator of Redland’s Positive Behavior Intervention Strategies (PBIS) program.

The PBIS process emphasizes constructive interventions as an alternative to punitive discipline. Redland, a bright, airy middle school, has struggled with more aggressive, less responsive disciplinary referrals for students and parents.

Despite the systemic obstacles that have hampered progress nationwide, many educators and their schools are finding that caring, more aggressive, less responsive discipline referrals for students and parents.

Meet Lynn Harrison of Redland Middle School in Montgomery County, MD. You know you’re onto something good when your school goes from referring over 1200 students to the principal’s office to under 30 in just one year. “As a staff we were thrilled at the respect that was growing in our building,” says Harrison, coordinator of Redland’s Positive Behavior Intervention Strategies (PBIS) program.

The PBIS process emphasizes constructive interventions as an alternative to punitive discipline. Redland, a bright, airy middle school, has struggled with more aggressive, less responsive disciplinary referrals for students and parents.

Despite the systemic obstacles that have hampered progress nationwide, many educators and their schools are finding that caring, more aggressive, less responsive discipline referrals for students and parents.

Meet Lynn Harrison of Redland Middle School in Montgomery County, MD. You know you’re onto something good when your school goes from referring over 1200 students to the principal’s office to under 30 in just one year. “As a staff we were thrilled at the respect that was growing in our building,” says Harrison, coordinator of Redland’s Positive Behavior Intervention Strategies (PBIS) program.

The PBIS process emphasizes constructive interventions as an alternative to punitive discipline. Redland, a bright, airy middle school, has struggled with more aggressive, less responsive disciplinary referrals for students and parents.

Despite the systemic obstacles that have hampered progress nationwide, many educators and their schools are finding that caring, more aggressive, less responsive discipline referrals for students and parents.

Meet Lynn Harrison of Redland Middle School in Montgomery County, MD. You know you’re onto something good when your school goes from referring over 1200 students to the principal’s office to under 30 in just one year. “As a staff we were thrilled at the respect that was growing in our building,” says Harrison, coordinator of Redland’s Positive Behavior Intervention Strategies (PBIS) program.

The PBIS process emphasizes constructive interventions as an alternative to punitive discipline. Redland, a bright, airy middle school, has struggled with more aggressive, less responsive disciplinary referrals for students and parents.

Despite the systemic obstacles that have hampered progress nationwide, many educators and their schools are finding that caring, more aggressive, less responsive discipline referrals for students and parents.

Meet Lynn Harrison of Redland Middle School in Montgomery County, MD. You know you’re onto something good when your school goes from referring over 1200 students to the principal’s office to under 30 in just one year. “As a staff we were thrilled at the respect that was growing in our building,” says Harrison, coordinator of Redland’s Positive Behavior Intervention Strategies (PBIS) program.

The PBIS process emphasizes constructive interventions as an alternative to punitive discipline. Redland, a bright, airy middle school, has struggled with more aggressive, less responsive disciplinary referrals for students and parents.

Despite the systemic obstacles that have hampered progress nationwide, many educators and their schools are finding that caring, more aggressive, less responsive discipline referrals for students and parents.

Meet Lynn Harrison of Redland Middle School in Montgomery County, MD. You know you’re onto something good when your school goes from referring over 1200 students to the principal’s office to under 30 in just one year. “As a staff we were thrilled at the respect that was growing in our building,” says Harrison, coordinator of Redland’s Positive Behavior Intervention Strategies (PBIS) program.

The PBIS process emphasizes constructive interventions as an alternative to punitive discipline. Redland, a bright, airy middle school, has struggled with more aggressive, less responsive disciplinary referrals for students and parents.

Despite the systemic obstacles that have hampered progress nationwide, many educators and their schools are finding that caring, more aggressive, less responsive discipline referrals for students and parents.